I was looking for a high-resolution copy of the new Google logo and couldn't find one, so I made my own. I'm sending it here for those who need it. Enjoy. For all the big companies out there: when you refuse to publish high-quality copies of your logos, you don't protect your brand- all you do is get people to recreate your own Photoshop. After all, what have you really achieved? Instead of your genuine company logo being used without your permission... Now you have a crappy fake used without your permission. And on that note, dear readers, I am I to you... Google's new logo! I have two versions here for your viewing pleasure. The first version is the highest resolution official Google logo that I could find. I found it on Google's blog, Google Design, turned out to be up a notch. The only real limitation of this image is that it has a white background instead of a transparent background. The official new Google logo (White background) click the logo below for a larger image of the second version of Photoshopped fake. It has a higher resolution and transparent background, but it's not quite identical to the genuine Google logo (it's damn close though). The unofficial new Google logo (Transparent background) click the logo below for a larger image link to the SparkToro Review link to The Combine Review. At this time, select the Magic Wand tool from the toolbox. The Magic Wand Tool is a great device to get the image you are trying to pick the rough out. This tool will select the area of the photo depending on the hue of the image. Try not to stress, for getting everything exactly right using this device, but you don't get the unpleasant definition of the pattern you're trying to remove from the background. You need to click on the image to make the basic definition and then hold the move key when clicking to keep including the choice until you have the whole picture that you can exclude chosen. At this point you will most likely notice that not the entire movie has been selected, or that the choice is not a flawless look. To fix this, Photoshop has a handy work in the apparatus to help clean up with increasing your resolve. Directly under the Shading Selection Area in the Tool box are two small symbols resembling cameras. This one is on the privilege of Editing in fast mask mode, click on this one and anything you haven't chosen will turn red. At this point, you can use an eraser tool to add to your determination, and brush the apparatus to rule out your choice. After using these tools to tidy up your choices, click on the edit as standard, catch to see your completed selection. At this point you can click on edit, copy, and then click on the new file to open another picture. At this point, you'll have your displayed image with a transparent background. One answer to this question is to banish the background using Photoshop directness - it's a regularly simple task, Finish and gives you the opportunity to use your logo (or other image) on the background you like. Pursue these these Steps to exclude the background from the photo: 1. Open Photoshop and upload an image of the Photoshop launch and open the photo through the Document of the Open menu. 2. Make a new transparent layer when your photo is stacked, you should put a transparent layer under the layer that has your image on it. This will at this point make another layer that has a transparent background Google logo png you can tell that the background is too transparent, if it is checkered like a chessboard When you have made this layer, you have to ensure that it is put under a layer with the image on. 3. Select the background area to remove you now need to use the enchantment wand tool to select the background area that essentials are evacuated. To do this, basically snap and drag the enchantment wand over the background area that you need to leave behind. The selected zone should have a spotted line around it with the goal that you can without much plot to see which region has been chosen. 4. Erase the background when you are satisfied with your determination, you have to press the wipe button on the console. This should exclude the background of the image and in its place should be a checkered (for example, transparent) background. 5. Spare images you will now be able to spare the picture in different configurations, although the savings in the JPEG organization will result in directness being lost. The greed in most of the different arrangements should be excellent and directness should be held. Transparent background is a typical errand that many creators have to act on in Photoshop is the transparent background of the Google logo png. Without a transparent background, Google's logo regularly situations with an organization or site logos that have a shaded background - this makes it difficult to put the logo on different shades of backgrounds as it does significant looks weak and creates an amateur look.
